Signing class attendance

Thirty seconds, on your phone, in the hall. You need your university Google account and the code on the board.

1. Open your course page and tap Sign attendance.
2. Sign in with your university account. A personal Gmail will not work.
3. First time only: type your index number, name and programme. After that the page remembers you.
4. Type the four-digit code from the board.
5. Tap Sign in. You should see You are marked present. Close the page; you are done.

Signed in with the wrong account?

This is the usual problem: most phones are already signed in to a personal Gmail.

Android

Tap your profile picture, top right of the page, and choose your university account (or Add account).

Still stuck? Open a new Incognito tab in Chrome and sign in there.

iPhone

Links opened from WhatsApp or Gmail use that app's own browser, with a different account.

Press and hold the link, choose Open in Safari, then sign in.

If something goes wrong

"Not a university account"
Personal Gmail. Switch account at the top right.

"You need access"
Same thing, caught earlier. Switch account, or use a private window.

"That code is not right"
Check the board. The code changes every class.

"No class is open"
Attendance has closed, or has not opened. Say so during the class.

Asked to type your details
Normal on some phones. Fill them in and carry on.

Nothing loads
Turn mobile data off and on, reload, and tell the lecturer before you leave.

Sign only for yourself. Signing in for an absent friend is an attendance offence, for both of you.

Check your record any time. My attendance, under the sign-in box, shows your classes and your percentage. Only you can see it.

Why we do it this way. The code proves you were in the hall, and signing in with your own account means nobody can mark you absent by mistake, or present when you were not. Your attendance is kept privately by your lecturer: no list of names ever appears on the website.
